In 1894, a report from the American Medical Association claimed, "Never, nowhere, does a drug replace a moral want or deficiency in man" and argued, "This moral basis of a cure is true, and it gives the best possible and only assurance of its duration." Today, the medical community believes that the opposite is true--that drug addiction is not a personal or moral failure. But the stigma still persists and often discourages people from seeking detox to begin the first step toward recovery.
